

Source 1 - Zhang 21 Paper

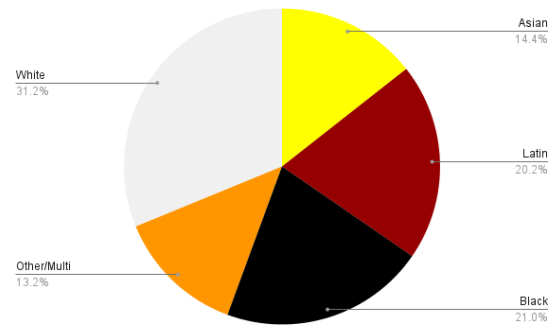

The Zhang paper examines hate crimes against Asian Americans from 1992 to 2014 using data from the National Incident-Based Reporting System (NIBRS), comparing them with crimes targeting African Americans and Hispanics. It explores two theoretical models: the minority-general model, which posits that hate crimes against all minorities share similar characteristics, and the minority-specific model, which argues that Asian Americans experience unique hate crime patterns due to stereotypes like the "model minority" myth. The findings reveal significant differences in offender demographics and incident characteristics for Asian Americans, supporting the minority-specific model. Unlike hate crimes against African Americans or Hispanics, which are often perpetrated by White offenders, those targeting Asians are more likely to involve non-White perpetrators, often strangers, and occur in neighborhoods where Asians are not the majority.

However, the study's temporal focus (1992–2014) limits its relevance to more recent trends, particularly the surge in anti-Asian hate crimes during the COVID-19 pandemic. The pandemic introduced a dramatic escalation in public, violent attacks against Asians, fueled by xenophobic rhetoric like "China virus." While the study underscores longstanding challenges such as underreporting and systemic invisibility, it does not address the contemporary political and social climate, including intensified scapegoating and heightened visibility of anti-Asian violence. This gap highlights the importance of extending research beyond 2014 to capture the evolving dynamics of hate crimes against Asian Americans in light of recent crises.
